The undergraduate curriculum at Bard College creates a flexible system of courses that gives coherence, breadth, and depth to the four years of study and helps students become knowledgeable across academic boundaries and able to think critically within a discipline or mode of thought. The pillars of the Bard education: Language and Thinking Program. A liberal arts education offers students both breadth and depth of learning. At Bard, the primary sources of breadth are the First-Year Seminar and the distribution requirements. The primary source of depth is the requirement that each student major in a stand-alone academic program, possibly in conjunction with a non-stand-alone field of study, or concentration, or with another program in a joint major. Service learning has found a comfortable home in higher education as a pedagogical strategy. In many cases, service learning offices are located within or connected to centers for faculty development. And, how does this learning about service and civic engagement relate to the rest of the academic agenda to which students are exposed in their undergraduate programs? At CSUMB, service learning is more than just a pedagogy or approach to teaching. At CSUMB, service learning is not housed in a faculty development office. Nor is it a unit of student affairs. Service learning is an academic department, and a legitimate member of the academic community, participating in all aspects of academic program planning and implementation. HSE Academic Handbook. Distance Learning. For HSE Faculty Members. Distance Learning. Students who breach the agreement for paid educational services concluded upon admission to studies may be suspended from the examination by the dean’s directive. Students must arrive for the examination at the time indicated in the examination schedule. Those who arrived for the examination but then decided not to participate due to health reasons must declare it before the receipt of an examination assignment. During the examination, students may use syllabuses, reference books and other sources, as determined by the teacher and stated in the course syllabus.
