Scholars in virtually all of the traditional areas of psychological inquiry have come to recognize that human behavior and development take place in the context of relationships with other people, and thus, in order to accomplish psychology’s aim of understanding and predicting human behavior, it is necessary to incorporate the relationship context into psychological theory and research. As the title suggests, this book examines the psychology of interpersonal relations. In the context of this book, the term “interpersonal relations” denotes relations between a few, usually between two, people. How one person thinks and feels about another person, how he perceives him and what he does to him, what he expects him to do or think, how he reacts to the actions of the other—these are some of the phenomena that will be treated. Our concern will be with “surface” matters, the events that occur in everyday life on a conscious level, rather than with the unconscious.
